The Slayer hits shelves

by Randall Perry

Begin with a murder: a young woman is found floating in a city pond. No visible signs of trauma, save for the letter S carved on her face. The case baffles investigators. After a year and a half it grows cold.

Enter Const. Danielle Renaud: an ambitious, lesbian RCMP officer, who's become bored as a general investigator and would like to make her move into special investigations. She's assigned the cold case: perhaps it's tokenism, maybe a long shot, but she's eager to prove herself. What follows will test her limits.

Halifax author Nadine LaPierre's first novel, The Slayer is being released this summer from Frisson Books. The title is not a reference to the villain of the novel, nor is it an indicator of the ubiquitous vampire/werewolf/zombie angst-ridden genre of novel dominating bestseller lists.

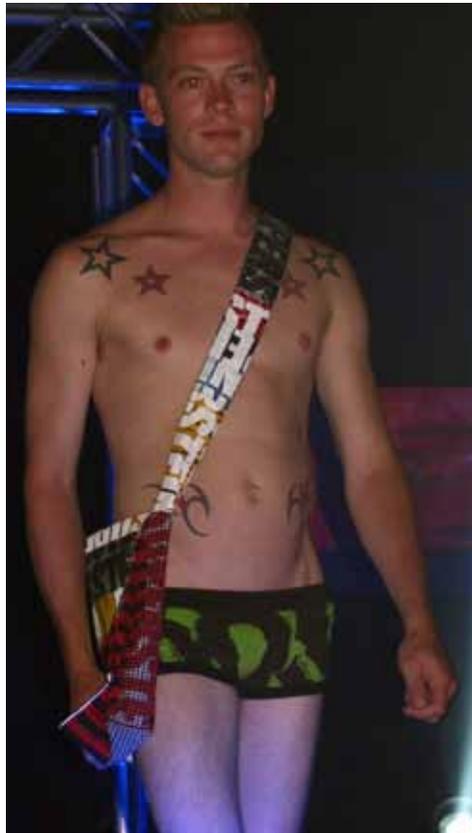

"[The title] refers to the history of the murder victim... a slayer of hearts," LaPierre explains. "I was hesitant at first to reveal that, but it's not a spoiler."

LaPierre infuses the smart, sexy mystery novel with humour and romance, introducing us to a range of compelling characters. There's Renaud, who, in the course of the investigation is drawn romantically to her best friend, Crown prosecutor Lilly Marsh, who is Mi'kmaq and herself a lesbian. Along the way their professional and personal lives intersect, and not always in a good way. Two other main characters round out the cast—Nathalie Boudreau, a lyricist and composer friend of Lilly; and Melissa Lambert, a senior DNA technician at the RCMP crime lab.

LaPierre describes her inspiration for the novel as a "cinematic" experience: "It was a picture of a park in fall, with some fog rolling in, and I wrote my very first scene... it was like opening a tap! About seven months later I had the first draft of the novel."

LaPierre is no stranger to writing. "I had always kept a journal... and in my late 20s and early 30s I started writing dinner theatre-style murder mystery plays," she says. "I started putting them on for the lesbian community and they just got bigger and more popular."

Honest to God

United Memorial

by Daniel MacKay

In this series of articles, one per month over the next year or so, I'll be telling you about my experiences shopping for a church.

About my credentials: as a child, my Mom shopped us around to a variety of churches. I didn't have any concept of "belonging" to one, and I came to see many distinct facets of the churchgoing experience: on the grander side, there is a spiritual connection with a higher power, there's guidance to that, there's a moral compass, community, music, singing, and the grandeur of the worship space; on the more mundane side there is belonging to a community or what many of us would now call a chosen family, enjoyment of music and singing, social time, refreshments after the service, activities outside church time, and home visits from your pastor.

I'm writing as a theological layman, a possible future member. As any reviewer does, I'll keep in mind that it is impossible to experience something both as a full participant and as a reviewer.

For each worship, Gabe and I went "as a couple"—not holding hands but obviously together.

On May 22 we visited United Memorial Church, in Halifax's North End. It's a five-minute walk from my house, so I've attended many Christmas services there but never a regular one.

The rest of the United Church congregations we'll be visiting are "Affirming"—that is, the congregation has made a decision to consciously and actively welcome LGBT folk, and perform weddings. United Memorial is not officially so, but the first words in the bulletin state that it is an inclusive community.

The worship space is beautiful; there are detailed stained glass windows, the pews and balcony curve to face the sanctuary. A massive stand of organ pipes dominates the apse—the front of the space. Some time ago the ceiling was re-done with 12" acoustic tile which doesn't really fit the formality and austere beauty of the rest of the decor. A Maple Leaf flag and Union Jack hung at the left and right of the chancel.

Thirty-eight members and visitors were there; over coffee and cookies later, regulars said that is about half of the usual number. Gabe and I were two of ten people under fifty years old; there were no people of colour; all of the older members were in their "Sunday best" so I was underdressed in a sweater, jeans, and sandals. After the first couple of readings, about a half-dozen children went off to Sunday School.

We were recognized as visitors and greeted at the door, again when we sat down in a pew, and again at the beginning of the social time after.

Our cover this month is a collection of shots of the SUPERSTEIN fashion show. Front and centre is John Walke, with Modern Vision's Alex Roberts and Mario Richard to either side. Pictures of the models all around were artfully assembled and arranged by Cam MacLeod.

The organist was away for the weekend and one of the members was playing piano instead.

The regular minister was away on study break, and on this day, student minister Michelle Armstrong was presiding. Her eloquent and eclectic sermon tied in with the first reading (John 14:2, "In my Father's house there are many rooms") began with a quote from a song, "It ain't cool to be Christian" and explored the decline of Christianity over the last fifty years, the role of the members in "post Christian-dom" where there is a vast plurality of types of worship and many people who don't worship at all. She touched on themes of learning to ride a bicycle, moving away from home, and Christians being depicted in popular culture—from the Simpsons to Big Bang Theory—as oddballs or simple-minded, and explored the idea of us being building materials (stones) which are selected and shaped by a mason, and that the oddest shaped stone often becomes the keystone for an opening.

Most of the attendees moved back to the equally beautiful hall after the service for coffee, sandwiches and sweets, and several people including the secretary of the church, and an elder who in 1955, built the house in which I live, introduced themselves, made conversation, and invited us back.

It's possible that John 14:2 refers to people of all faith traditions being welcomed by a loving god. I'm looking forward to taking you to more of these rooms over the next few months.

Save the Date: Update on This Year's Gala

by Kevin Kindred

Preparations are underway for this year's annual NSRAP gala, to be held on October 22 at 6:30 p.m. This year's event, hosted by Candy Palmeter, star of The Candy Show, will be held at the Marriott Harbourfront Hotel in Halifax, NS, and will feature a performance from Grammy Award-winning performer Matt Alber.

Every year, the gala serves as a celebration of the LGBT community and the accomplishments of the Nova Scotia Rainbow Action Project. The event also raises funds to ensure our continued success. The theme of this year's gala is "Takin' it to the Streets," which exemplifies the need for street-level advocacy and awareness of LGBT issues. In keeping with this theme, keynote speaker Matt Alber will speak of his work with LGBT homeless youth.

Traditionally, NSRAP has awarded the Rev. Darlene Young Community Hero Award to a member of the LGBT community who has made a significant contribution to our society. This year we will be introducing additional awards to recognize other community members. These awards include a new Allies Award that recognizes the contributions of an ally to the LGBT cause and a Media Award to be presented to an individual or organization that has brought awareness to community issues through traditional or social media. We will also be introducing a Corporate Stewardship Award to recognize a corporation that embraces and values its LGBT employees.

We will be accepting nominations for these awards through August 22. Details and application information can be found on our Web site at www.nsrp.ca/gala.

The night promises to be a gay affair for all—please join us for an evening of entertainment to celebrate and support the work of NSRAP in our vibrant community!

NSRAP held its Annual General Meeting on June 18 at the Company

House. Chair Matt Numer led a review of the accomplishments over the past year including highlights such as our work with other groups to host the International Day Against Homophobia. Other notable successes include the outreach work of the Elders Project (including creating the elder LGBT community groups, the Elderberries) and the successful campaign to encourage Q104 to change its homophobic station identifier in December 2010.

NSRAP has set a new fundraising goal for 2011-2012 for $75,000; these funds will ensure stability for the organization and ensure long-term success. Outgoing treasurer, Sean Foreman, reported that NSRAP is in stable financial condition.

Our goal of establishing a community centre in Halifax has taken a major step forward. NSRAP has put forward an offer to take over Safe Harbour's community events and programs (e.g., Transgender Day of Remembrance). As well, an anonymous donor has offered to pay for a year's rent at Veith House for NSRAP, taking over the existing Safe Harbour space. Veith House is able to provide additional community space, office facilities and support staff that will hopefully become a connecting point for a variety of organizations. The hope is that this coalition will one day become its own organization.

The new 2011-2012 Board of Directors was also elected: Matthew Numer, Sean Foreman, Curtis Cartmill, Doug Bungay, Margaret Denike, Lucas Thorne-Humphrey, Scott Comber, Lynn Murphy, Kevin Kindred, Adam Sterling, Rosemarie Porter, Nathaniel Smith, Brenda Merritt and Anne Carswell. Immediately following the AGM, the board members present met briefly to elect their new executive.

Newly elected Vice-Chair Curtis Cartmill led a community roundtable on issues on which NSRAP should focus in the upcoming year. Highlights included: reaching out to various communities in Nova Scotia, identifying new ways to reach those communities, clarifying benefits of membership.

The full minutes of NSRAP's AGM, community roundtable and annual activity report will be posted online no later than August 1.

Transsexual Health Care in Newfoundland

Negotiating Red Tape and Old Stereotypes

In June 2007, Jefferson McCreath, a male who knew she was actually a woman born transsexual, moved to Newfoundland to take a job with the provincial government. Shortly after establishing herself into her new house, new job and new town, she took immediate steps to start her transition.

Although transsexualism was traditionally considered a mental illness the global medical community has almost unanimously recognized it as a physiological condition that can only be rectified through physical intervention: hormone replacement therapy (HRT) and sex reassignment surgery (SRS).

The Harry Benjamin Standards of Care, 6th Edition, (SOC) are globally recognized as the best-practice for transsexual health care. McCreath was saddened to learn that this protocol was not recognized in Newfoundland. Even worse, she found an old out-of-date government policy that required patients to travel to Toronto to complete a program at the infamous Gender Identity Clinic at the Centre for Addictions and Mental Health (CAMH), before the province would fund SRS. She also found that most other procedures were not covered, no matter what.

McCreath had already become familiar with the many horror stories that had been told by CAMH patients about the negative treatment and strange research experiments they were apparently forced to undergo before being considered for funding; and how a reported 90% of patients

"going full time" before ever taking a hormone pill. Finally, in early 2008, Jennifer had put together a suitable medical team that would provide hormones, and eventually, a recommendation for surgery.

Before starting HRT, Jennifer knew that she would have to store sperm if she had ever hoped to become a biological parent. While the Newfoundland Health care system often provides this service to testicular cancer patients, she was advised that this would not likely be covered for her. So Jennifer opened the wallet and traveled to a private clinic to have sperm stored.

The HRT first started with estrogen and a testosterone blocker. Quickly, it became evident that the blocker had adverse side effects. So rather than wait for her to complete her one year Real Life Experience test (RLE) to prove her readiness for SRS, her doctors supported the idea that she should immediately seek to have her testes removed. Well, once again, Jennifer dug deep into the wallet and found herself traveling to a private clinic, in the USA.

were rejected. The SOC make it clear that any team of doctors can oversee the application of the protocol. The idea that a special mental illness gender clinic would be required seemed absurd, so she decided not to attend there.

Even through private care, McCreath knew that she would not be able to get HRT or SRS unless she was able to procure the services of doctors who would act as gatekeepers to allow access to the product. So the search was on.

Meanwhile, McCreath couldn't wait to get her transition under way. So she took the primitive step of

I Am What I AmherstAmherst raises pride flag ...and that's all

by Gerard Veldhoven

So far the summer has been a great disappointment, with rain and cool temperatures. Pride celebrations will not be hampered by nature and we hear rumblings of great plans throughout Atlantic Canada. The queer community is ready and anxious to get activities underway. Here in Cumberland County the celebrations this year are downgraded to just one activity: the flag-raising in Amherst on July 11. In previous years Pride Week was initiated by Cumberland Pride, but due the collapse of the society activities will not take place, at least not for this year. Some members of the former organization have indicated a willingness to begin a new group in the fall. So far, it is only speculation, but Wayves readers will be kept abreast as more information becomes available.

I approached the Town of Amherst requesting the town once again to host the flag raising ceremony. The fact a certain organization no longer exists does not indicate that the queer community here is a non-entity. As a matter of fact, I asked the town to consider the fact that the LGBT community is alive and well and is a definite part of the fabric of the Town of Amherst and area. Town CAO Greg Herrett agreed and so the flag raising ceremony took place at noon on Monday, July 11, in front of about 50 people. Mayor Rob Small again proclaimed Pride Week from July 11 to 17. The keynote speaker at this event was Eldon Hay. Other guests included MLA Brian Skabar, MP Scott Armstrong and Cumberland County Warden Keith Hunter.

In another development, funds from the former Cumberland Pride Society were donated to PFLAG Canada to assist in developing educational and supportive programs for members of the queer community, their families and friends. The hand-over of the cheque took place in Sackville NB, on June 27 at the monthly meeting of the Sackville/Amherst Chapter of PFLAG Canada. At a get-together of a few former members of Cumberland Pride it was decided PFLAG would be a perfect choice and I presented the funds asking the money be used to further support and in any other way assist our brothers and sisters.

The state of New York has passed a new marriage law allowing same-sex couples to be legally married in one of the most populated areas in the United States. This news is of great interest to other states in the union and perhaps an indication of further equal marriage rights in a country that lags so far behind Canada and other western nations in equal rights and treatment.

American Author Ernest Gaines said, "Why is it that as a culture, we are more comfortable seeing two men holding guns than holding hands?"

Transsexual Health Care

2009 started with shock and disappointment. After initially feeling accepted at work, she noticed job duties being taken away and given to other new people in the organization. Then shortly thereafter, what was supposedly a safe and secure job became a layoff. While she had speculations that her transition may have been a factor, she did not have the resources or the energy to fight it. So Jennifer set out to do the impossible, find another job.

By this time, Jennifer had filed a Human Rights Complaint with the Human Rights Commission of Newfoundland and Labrador (HRC). The complaint was against the Newfoundland Medical Care Plan (MCP) for what she stated was discriminatory treatment, as she was denied care, and funding for care, as a transsexual, that would ordinarily be provided to others. She also complained that it was discriminatory for her to require a recommendation from CAMH, for procedures otherwise obtainable and fundable upon the recommendation of a Newfoundland doctor for others. Furthermore, she complained that MCP's policy to refuse to fund SRS at private clinics in Canada was inappropriate given the lack of such a service being available in Canada by any public institution.

Unfortunately, Gender Identity and Gender Expression are not included explicitly in the Human Rights Code of Newfoundland. So Jennifer's complaint was based on "sex." Two years later there has been no decision rendered by the HRC.

Jennifer specifically wanted to have her SRS performed by Dr. Pierre Brassard in Montreal, given that he was the only SRS surgeon in Canada, and given that he is considered one of the best in the world. A year later, and 40 job interviews later, Jennifer finally landed work (as a file clerk, of all things). While this job would only pay half of what she was previously earning, this would at least allow Jennifer to have a financial foundation and allow her to further build upon her credit rating. On January 24, Jennifer had SRS with Dr. Brassard.

One other issue that remained was that with almost three years of estrogen, Jennifer was not seeing mature breast development. After conducting extensive research, it became evident that adding the natural female hormone, progesterone, would be the only way for this to happen. Unfortunately for Jennifer, her doctor was reluctant to provide this hormone as the Canadian trans health network did not recommend it. Determined, Jennifer made yet another trip to the USA to a private medical clinic, where she was able to secure progesterone.

It may seem that Jennifer's transition is over, but that is far from reality. Although she has had nine laser sessions on her face, there is still an extensive amount of facial hair that will need to be eliminated through electrolysis. Additionally, Jennifer has been combating male pattern baldness, which is irreversible, by wearing wigs. This is far from an ideal solution; however, hair transplants are also expensive. Jennifer also needs to work on finding her female voice. Meanwhile, Jennifer continues to battle underemployment, and more recently, depression.

So, what's up next for Jennifer? She'll keep fighting for her rights and others, through educational and advocacy work. Jennifer's vision is for transsexuals, and any other non-cisgender-conforming individual, to have timely and funded care, upon recommendations from their local doctors.

Jennifer recently joined Canadian Professional Association of Transgender Health (CPATH) as a non-voting member, to become part of a policy development committee, where she took a leadership role in penning a membership expansion policy that would allow CPATH to grow. Jennifer hopes CPATH will become an internationally-recognized body of knowledge for trans health, so that they can combat the old myths of the American Psychiatric Association's DSM-V Gender Identity Committee, that transsexualism is a mental illness under the classification of "paraphilic fetish" (a label deemed suitable for sexual predators).

In addition to trans health policy work, Jennifer has also entered preliminary discussions with trans advocates from across the country to launch the first federal-government-registered trans advocacy non-profit company. Jennifer also continues to play a key role in community peer support and education. She frequently speaks publicly about trans issues, provides informal trans consulting advice on her blog, YouTube, and in person. Ultimately, Jennifer is concerned that she has essentially taken on the role of "unofficial spokesperson" for trans issues in Newfoundland, and even more concerned that it is she, not the Department of Health, who many people are turning to on a regular basis for help and advice.

Finally, Jennifer is also the newest member of the Wayves team, as she will be writing a monthly column, and has taken on the role of Newfoundland regional representative.

Crawford Hastie's KIBITZ AND BITCH

Hi Tom

In the much parodied musical, Oklahoma, (Oklahoma comes to mind, for example), Curly sings of the summer time beauty of the state when the “corn is as high as an elephant’s eye.” Aside from being somewhat unrealistic given the scarcity of pachyderms in the Sooner state, it does capture that rather exhilarating feeling of the height of the sunny season. I have a similar sensation now that Pride celebrations are happening all over the place when the rainbow flags are snapping and waving at the top of flag poles, floats are being built, drag queens are practicing their lip synching and lesbians are putting in extra practice, honing their softball skills. Okay, okay, lots of stereotypes, I know but you get what I mean. There are many aspects of queer pride.

The other day I was having a conversation with a friend who has come out fairly recently and we were discussing the nature of Pride. What does it mean to be proud? What is pride, he asked. I admit I was a bit stuck for an answer at first. I checked several dictionaries and found things like: “the quality or state of being proud; inordinate self-esteem, conceit, a reasonable or justifiable self-respect; delight or elation arising from some act, possession, or relationship.” These all made sense but somehow didn’t really connect with what Pride means to me. I think initially Pride celebrations were a kind of defiance, a refusal to be swallowed up in shame, an antidote to a prevailing social attitude that said that LGBT people were at worst, an abomination in Biblical terms, and at best, rather amusing as party accessories but never, ever real people. The first Pride celebrations presented the absurd notion that we were people and deserving of basic human dignity and respect. Most of us didn’t believe it even as we marched and danced and smile and waved, but it was a first step on the journey. I think of it as a kind of sliding scale that moves gradually from tolerance to acceptance to pride. My friend is sliding up and down that scale while I have a—mostly—firm grasp on pride. But what is it? How is where I am different from where he is?

I remember a question that used to come up in conversations. If you could take a pill and be straight, would you take it? Now, when I was a young man (I can hear you saying, That wasn’t yesterday!) and was first dealing with the feelings and sensations and peculiar thought patterns—or so they seemed at the time—I would absolutely have swallowed that pill, believing it would solve all my insurmountable problems. Now, I have not the slightest hesitation in saying, Absolutely not! In fact, the very idea makes my blood run cold. It would seem like taking away the very essence of who I am, removing an essential part of my personality and soul.

But am I proud to be gay? The word “proud” to me always seems like a sense of satisfaction at accomplishing something. Is being gay an accomplishment? Surviving as a gay person is certainly an accomplishment, and one that many people all over the world never succeed in achieving, but I’m not talking about survival.

These thoughts were with me the other night as I was ironing and watching a rerun of Golden Girls. The irrepressible Blanche was discussing with her niece the difference between being a slut and enjoying the company of gentlemen. A slut, she pointed out, was available to anyone without thought about her own desires and wants, she accepts others opinion of herself. Blanche, by contrast, had self-respect and took into consideration her feelings and needs when entering into a mutually satisfying relationship with a man. Of course, she also rated her lovers like Olympic gymnasts, including degree of difficulty of the attempted sexual act and whether they landed on their feet during the dismount. But her main point was valid.

Being proud for me, as a gay man, means examining for myself who I am as a human being and not relying, slut-like, for approval or disapproval from everyone else and accepting someone else’s idea of who I should be. When I was moving along the scale from tolerance to acceptance, I was measuring myself against a pattern or idea given to me by the larger society at the time. I took a big step towards Pride when I turned that measuring eye back on the larger society and questioned the basis and value of that pattern and came up with my own values, standards and principles that I would use to guide my life. I wouldn’t take the pill and blend in (horrible idea for anyone), instead I embrace my uniqueness and choose which people, places and situations will fit into my life and honour who I am. That’s how I define Pride... at least, today.

Oh, look at the time. I’ve got friends coming over for a feed of lobster so there is water to boil and drinks to chill. Happy Pride, Tom.

Love ya!

Hailed as an iconic Canadian fashion legend, John Walke launched his new SUPERSTEIN collection in his hometown of Moncton at the Oxygen night club on July 14. SUPERSTEIN’s lines include trendy styles of handmade silk-screened underwear, hoodies, shirts, tanks, v’s and more.

Walke got his start in the world of fashion in 1987 while living in New York City. His brand has been featured in Vogue, Paper, Flare, Fashion Television, MTV, Much Music and many others.

John Walke stated that he had an amazing time: “It was really one of my best shows ever. I thought Alex and Mario did a great job, and I was thrilled to see some of the River of Pride crew at the event.

“I hope the whole city and community come together and make Pride Moncton as good as it can be. To have people at odds over one group or another for Pride isn’t progressive. As a gay community maybe try a little harder to evolve and grow, work together and accept change, support something new and give the Pride a chance to grow and evolve.”

John says that he looks forward to returning and doing another show, for the community, for Moncton, for everyone, and wishes to thank Oxygen and all the models that walked the show, it really was a fantastic time.

LGBTQ Refugees: Coming to Canada

by Hugo Dann

This spring, queers across Canada wrote letters to Immigration Minister Jason Kenney, they started Facebook groups and held rallies, all in support of one young, gay man. On May 13, Alvaro Orozco was picked up by Toronto Police while waiting at a bus stop and whisked away to a detention centre, pending deportation back to Nicaragua. Mr. Orozco, now 25, had fled his home when he was only twelve years old, after repeated beatings from his homophobic father. He made his way slowly across the United States, living illegally. In 2005, he arrived in Toronto and claimed refugee status on the basis of his sexual orientation. His case attracted a lot of international media attention, and in Nicaragua the threats against his life, should he return, mounted. At his hearing in 2006, a member of the Immigration and Refugee Board declared that she didn’t believe he was “really gay.” Claim denied. He appealed, and the case dragged on for years. Meanwhile, he built a new life in Toronto, even winning an award from the city for his work with at-risk youth, always with the threat of imminent arrest and deportation hanging over him. This story has a happy ending. The rallies, letters and the Facebook pages all helped: Alvaro Orozco was allowed to stay in Canada on humanitarian and compassionate grounds.

Alvaro Orozco’s story serves as a timely reminder of how fortunate we are to live in Canada, a country that respects human rights and freedoms—to the extent that we are a beacon to those facing injustice and violence in their home countries. It also reminded our community how perilous life can be for LGBTQ people in most of the rest of the world. Even the mainstream media has picked up on the infamous anti-gay legislation in Uganda. We saw the Ugandan newspaper featuring the names and photos of LGBT rights activists under the headline, “Hang Them!” We read about the brutal murder of David Kato. Straight media has been less diligent in reporting homophobic killings in Jamaica and the proliferation of murder music, or the fate of young gay men in Iran, coerced into sex reassignment surgeries, or the death squads targeting queers in post-invasion Iraq. Even in South Africa, where LGBT rights are written into the constitution, lesbians have been subjected to the vicious practice of corrective rape. The problem seems so vast that just thinking about trying to help can be overwhelming. Yet there are things we can do. Certainly, we can help by writing to our elected officials and urging them to speak up for LGBTQ people in countries that do business with or seek aid from Canada.

We can also help on the smaller, more personal scale by getting involved with LGBTQ refugees here at home. If it had not been for the enthusiasm, the generosity of time and spirit of LGBTQ Canadians from coast to coast, Alvaro Orozco would most certainly have been deported; sent back to Nicaragua, quite possibly to his death. There are even ways we can support queer refugees right here in Atlantic Canada. We will consider these in the second part of this article. Meanwhile let me leave you with a link to the North Star Triangle Project, an initiative of LGBTQ activist, David Pepper: northstartriangle.blogspot.com. (For more on this queer refugee project, see also the July issue of Wayves.)

Coming Out as Bisexual

by Sara Montgomery

If you are curious about this topic, Google the title of this article and you will be able to read hours worth of stuff on it.

I scanned for twenty minutes and decided to exit and explain my version of whether or not you should come out as bisexual.

First, it is usually a process with developments in both positive and negative senses. Maybe it's like a keg of wine in the cellar, fermenting with time, by chance going sour due to air getting in, or unexpected temperature changes. You've got to get it to the point that tastes best for your palate.

About three years ago I started my study of bisexuality and began telling certain friends and family members about how I have a thing for women as well as men.

I was very careful when it came to choosing to whom I bared my soul. Consequently, I had good fortune (well, not with every individual, chiefly a gay woman who was interested in dating me) with stepping out of that famous closet and putting a toe in a fresh puddle of water.

Caution with who I am is forefront for many reasons. On one hand I don't like "hiding" and "holding back" because it is against my nature.

But on the other hand, I have to protect myself.

People judge bisexuality way more than homosexuality. I think it was the character Charlotte on Sex and the City who cried out, "They should pick a side! You can't have both!" (I'm paraphrasing, but she was exclaiming.)

What's with that saying, "You can't have your cake and eat it too"? What's the use of the cake if you can't eat it?

No, seriously, there is heavier biphobia than homophobia. Say you want to tell a same-sex friend you are bi: then you have to worry that they are worried that you're going to be interested in them. How frustrating! Again and again, silence rears its ugly head.

Ah, but the luxury of opening up to a friend who is bisexual as well. Or even gay or straight but one who honestly understands your plight. It's really nice.

I will say very forwardly that I believe if you fall in love with a same-sex friend (and suppose that there's an opposite-sex potential lover lingering), you should still go with your heart and take the risk of being considered gay, more often than not and maybe endlessly.

That could be the point where two individuals could enjoy the most wonderful wine with dinner and needless to say, the most exquisite company with it too.

Sir Isaac Brock: Was he a “Man’s man?”

by Christian Corbet

He was called “The Hero of Upper Canada,” a Major General in the War of 1812 who was assigned to Canada as a British Army Officer and administrator. His ultimate duty was to defend Upper Canada against the invasion of the Americans.

Sir Isaac Brock was born on the remote island of Guernsey, one of the Channel Islands just off the coast of France. Brock was brought up in a family known for military duty. He was tall, standing at an estimated 6’2”, with fine features and possessing warm auburn hair and grey blue eyes. By all accounts he was a handsome man, said to have been gentle, kind and thoughtful.

But was Brock a “man’s man?”

Brock wrote very little about his private life to family, friends or colleagues, and he mentioned even less about women, relationships with them or the like. Period historians who found the need to dispel gossip about Brock being gay (or bisexual) stated emphatically that he enjoyed the company of women. One Canadian woman even claimed to have been his fiancée at the time of his death on the battlefield. The latter was never proved true or false. Some contemporary historians have raised the query about his sexuality and even tour guides in Guernsey will publicly volunteer the possibility of Brock being homosexual, but again there is no actual proof.

A lot of the speculation is based on simple expectations of the day. Most men in Guernsey were married by the time they were in their mid 20’s, the same statistics for British men of that period. But Brock never married. Was it because he had dedicated his life to the military? Or did he not wish to commit himself knowing that he was lined up for battle one day and could be killed, leaving behind a widow and children? That of course is debatable, given the fact that many men in the military did marry and have children. Brock never married and did not have any issue.

On the cusp of all the bicentenary celebrations slated for 2012 within Canada, the United Kingdom and elsewhere, a few historians are raising the question again, “Was Sir Isaac Brock gay or potentially bisexual?” The short and most succinct answer is simply, “We will never know.” And does it matter? Of course for the LG-BTQA community it would matter because it would be yet another great member of our community for us to be proud of! However, what matters the most is the historical fact that the “Hero of Upper Canada” was a true “bona fide” hero: gay, straight or otherwise. He led us to the freedom we enjoy today and that, in and of itself, is something to commemorate. Sir Isaac Brock KB was born on October 6, 1769 in Guernsey, Channel Islands and died on October 13 1812 during the Battle of Queenston Heights. His efforts in the quick victories at Fort Mackinac and Detroit crippled American invasion efforts and earned him the Order of the Bath, a knighthood that he would never learn of, with the news arriving a day after his death.

*Letters From CambodiaCambodian lesbians turning to technology

by Kenny Ingram

Concerned about the well-being of his 18-year-old friend who recently came out to her parents as a lesbian, Srorn Srorn posted a message on Facebook to let people know she was being held against her will.

"She has been confined to her bedroom and her parents are demanding that she marry a man," explains Srorn, 30, who has not been able to contact his friend directly for the past two months because she is forbidden to leave home and her phone was taken.

"She met her girlfriend two years ago in grade 10," he recalls effortlessly. "The parents did not know [they were dating] until the mother saw the girls kissing and hugging in the house," he continues, adding that an arranged marriage with a man was put into planning soon after.

"The mother asked her to get married but the daughter [making an excuse] said she wanted to go to school first. Her Mom disagreed and they got into a big argument."

Srorn's alert about the situation gained a lot of attention from his friends on Facebook (in excess of 1,200 people). As an outspoken LGBT rights activist and lobbyist for the past 10 years, he is all too familiar with similar stories among lesbians in Phnom Penh, the capital of Cambodia, in addition to those living in rural areas. Srorn was recently sponsored by the UN to visit New York City in June where he spoke about LGBT issues in Cambodia. Upon his return he ran a workshop with 11 lesbians to encourage social-networking and group discussions about their experiences.

"Most of them complained about discrimination [and] harassment," he recalls. "One also said she was almost raped," says Srorn, who describes how some Cambodians believe they can "make lesbians turn into women" by raping them.

"Lesbians are targets for sexual violence because some men think they are more fresh. They believe all lesbians are virgins and have no risk of [sexually transmitted] disease."

Among his other concerns is the disparity in funding for lesbians compared to gay men. Non-government organizations (NGOs) in Cambodia amount to the second highest in the world (per capita), trailing behind Rwanda with an estimated 3,000 international and local agencies.

Despite this relative abundance of research and funding programs Srorn says that health statistics and support services for lesbians are scarce.

"We have over 30 NGOs that focus on gay [men] because of HIV programs," he says, adding that only two of the organizations offer specific services for women who identify as lesbian.

He emphasizes that in rural areas, where 80 per cent of the population are roughly equal in representation up until grade 3 in Cambodia, though the amount of women can drop to lower than 10 per cent in university classrooms.

The quality of education in Cambodia also presents barriers according to Srorn, as basic reproductive health remains a work in progress for the National Curriculum. Preventing unwanted pregnancies and reducing the spread of sexually transmitted diseases have become more common topics in classrooms because of NGO support; however, discussions about sexual intercourse remain highly taboo and information about sexuality is rare, especially those written in the local language, Khmer.

To overcome some of these barriers, Srorn says that lesbians, in addition to others in the LGBT community, are using the internet and their mobile phones as a more comfortable—and perhaps safer—means of education and communication.

"Telephones [mobile] are very cheap in Cambodia and let people stay in touch. When two guys or two girls meet they can stay in touch and share ideas," he says, adding that text messaging can be quick and discreet, while also allowing LGBT youth to overcome geographic distances.

He notes that social-networking sites on the internet are also becoming popular among the youth. For example, Facebook users in Cambodia continue to skyrocket, jumping almost 70 per cent in the past six months according to Socialbakers, a website that compiles Facebook statistics. Srorn frequently posts words of encouragement and messages that concern LGBT rights. Recognizing the potential of this site as an information source and exchange hub of ideas, he posts upwards of 80 comments a day.

The glaring problem remains, however, that technology is providing the younger generations with capacity while older LGBT are being left out.

"The older [Cambodians] are not familiar with this technology and fewer of their friends use Facebook or cell phones," explains Srorn. "Many [grew up] in the belief that they could say nothing [about sexuality] because they have been taught that being a lesbian is wrong and unnatural, but the younger are keen for change and I think that is where the potential [for Cambodia] is."

as a whole resides, lesbians can face far greater challenges compared to those in urban centers.

"Girls can make more money in cities. They have more capacity and more opportunities to make decisions for themselves, including choosing who they want to marry."

"But in the countryside girls are less likely to finish high school and very few go to university because they are expected to stay at home to help with [traditional domestic] work or raise children," Srorn explains. He notes a trend whereby boys and girl

People kept saying, 'You should write a novel.'

With expressive, off-beat titles like Fraught with the Sin, DRAG! Hotkatz vs. Boykers and Shootin' at the Fritz LaPierre's plays give away the author's knack for capturing her audience's attention from the outset. "I've always been creative," she says. "I paint, I've written music, and for awhile when I was in my teens and early 20s I enjoyed sculpting. When I moved onto writing murder mystery plays it was just a natural progression of that creativity."

"What I discovered from writing my plays was how to bring humour and human drama into the entertainment. Even though it's an intelligent mystery, people still want to enjoy a good story. I wanted to bring the balance between intelligent and entertaining."

LaPierre has a day job and writing every day is sometimes out of the question; she devotes her weekends and days off to honing her craft. "I take Saturday evenings off, though, because balance is very important."

Research is also important. No CSI effect here: thanks to excellent and thorough sources, the novel's science is grounded in reality. "I wanted the police officers, the medical examiners, the lawyers... anyone who worked in those fields in Nova Scotia to read and nod in agreement. I was able to get excellent sources from the RCMP, medical examiners and the public prosecution service," she says.

Another Const. Rneau book, Verity and the Virgin Queen, is scheduled for release in 2012. LaPierre has projected three books, but there might well be more. "We'll cross that bridge when we get to it," she laughs.

Chef's Corner

This is the most delicate of the wild mushroom flavours, in my opinion, and they are only available fresh for a short period of time each year, usually from some point in August to end of September. This depends on many factors, from how much or little rain, sun and shade, etc. These distinctive golden yellow gems are still hand-picked from the forest floor and, as far as I know, are not being cultivated as many other formerly wild species are today. They are available at most farmers' market in the region, and if you are so inclined you can go out for a walk in the forest to see what you can find.

Golden Chanterelle Mushroom Soup

Ingredients

2 lb fresh cleaned chanterelles (thinly sliced)
 1 leek (white only) thinly sliced well cleaned of all the sand
 2 cloves garlic (minced)
 1/4 cup unsalted butter
 2 bay leaves
 1/4 cup Vermouth or white cooking wine
 4 1/2 cups chicken or vegetable stock
 1/2 cup heavy cream (optional)
 1 Tbsp picked fresh thyme leaves (stir in at end)

 1/2 cup grated Swiss cheese (for garnish)
 several drops of white truffle oil on each portion (as garnish)

Method

1. In a medium size sauce pan (4 qt) over medium heat, sweat the leeks, garlic, bay leaves and mushroom in the melted butter, until soft and starting to take on some colour (approx 10 min). 2. Add the Vermouth and reduce by half. 3. Add the stock, cover and bring to a boil. Turn down to a simmer and cook for 1/2 hour. 4. Remove 1/3 of the mix to a blender or food processor and blend smooth. 5. Return the blended soup to the pot, stir in the cream (optional) and thyme and heat through. 6. Adjust seasoning (salt and pepper) and ladle into hot serving bowls. 7. Top with some grated cheese, a couple of drops truffle oil and enjoy.
